It was good to let his brother remain governor of so important a place as Dublin; but the House at the same time voted that the merits and services of Colonel Sidney should in due time be taken into consideration (BLENCOWE, Sidney Papers, p. 16; Commons' Journals, v. 6). His arrears of pay for his Irish employment, which amounted to 1,809*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.*, were not voted him till October 1649 (ib. vi. 2).

As some compensation, Sidney was appointed governor and afterwards (13 Oct.

It has been conjectured that his scheme was an agreement of the two houses for the deposition of the king, and it is certain that the absence of the assent of the lords to the ordinance for the king's trial was one of his chief reasons for objecting to its validity (ib. p. 282; cf. Sidney's letter to the Earl of Leicester, 10 Jan. 1648, printed by Toland). Sidney also opposed in parliament the engagement proposed to be required from the council of state, which bound those taking it to declare their approval of the king's exin these two points: first, the king could be tried by no court; secondly, that no man could be tried by that court. This being the case, and Cromwell using these words: "I tell you we will cut off his head, with the crown upon it," I replied, "You may take your own course, I cannot oppose you, but I will keep myself clean from giving any hand in this business," immediately went out of the room and never returned' (BLENCOWE, p. 237). To this narrative, contained in a letter written to his brother in 1660, Sidney adds: 'I had an

Sidney regarded the Protector as 'a tyrant and a violent one,' but took no part either in the republican plots against him or in the opposition in parliament (Trial, ed. 1772, p. 32). He contented himself with his protest. Some letters among Thurloe's papers written during a visit of Sidney to Holland in 1654 prove that the government thought it necessary to keep an eye upon his correspondence (ii. 501, 522, 649). He showed his dislike of the protectorate by standing aloof. In 1656, however, he caused to be performed at Penshurst a play which was construed as

Project Abstract

Problem Definition:

Design a software to summarize a piece of text and summarize into a meaningful summary of few lines, which is within logically acceptable limit along with its genre.

FEATURES OF THE APPLICATION:

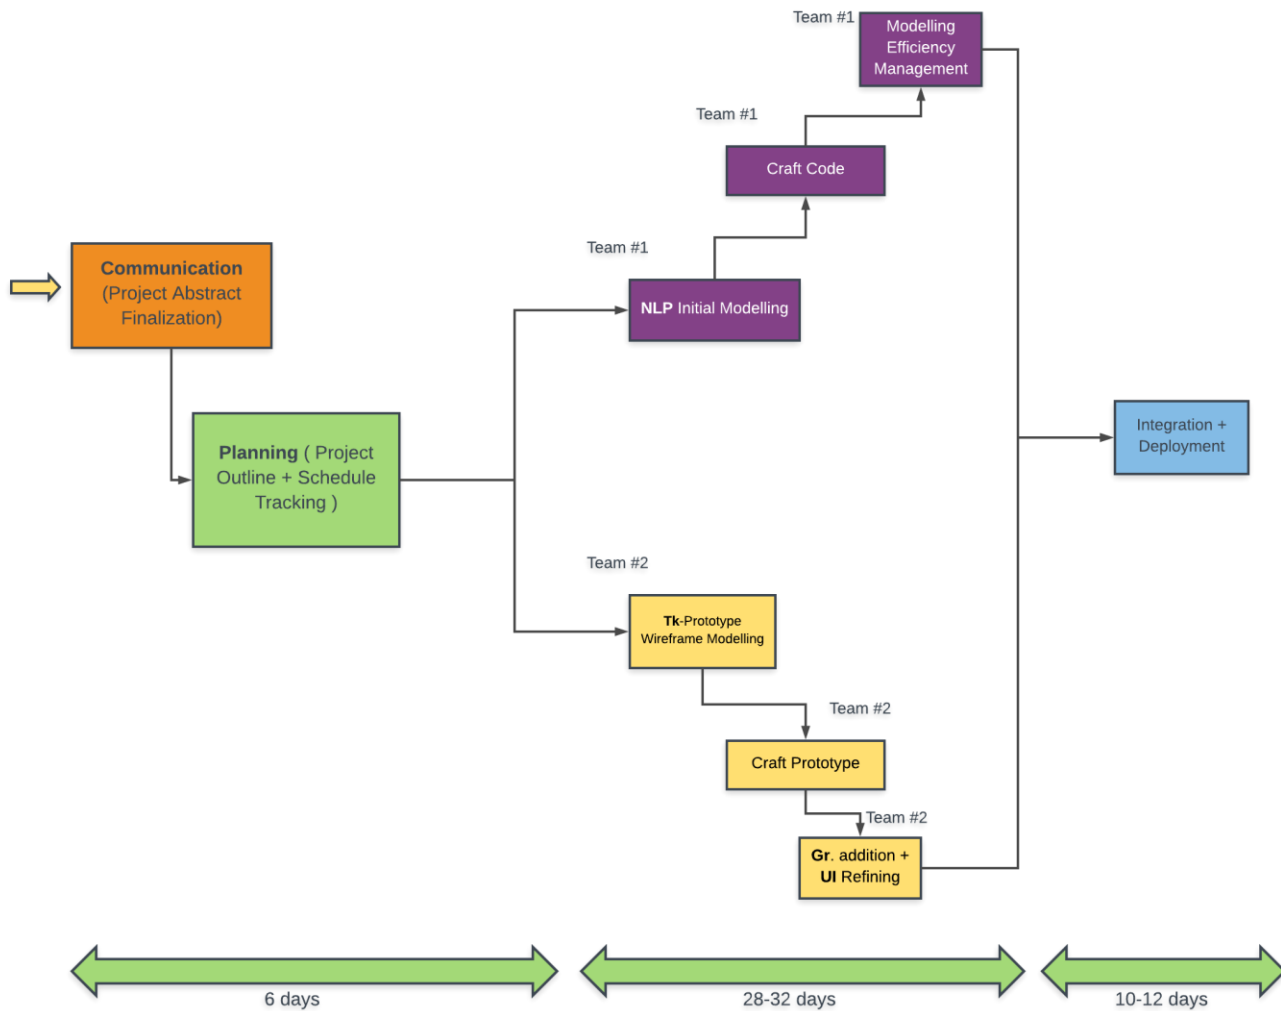

The project is a desktop application based on Python-Tkinter UI framework. The user is supposed to input a text, for example, the input could be a small paragraph, long essay, and article. It might be cut pasted text from Wikipedia, image processed text, handwritten text image or web-scraped text material. Irrespective of the type of text, the software would take the input, process it down and output the synopsis of the input (length in accordance to the input length) and its genre.

As a small addition to make the software UI interactive, the ongoing processing activity would be accompanied by Matplotlib-graphs as a roll on.

PROCESS MODEL EMPLOYED:

The process employed here is Rapid Application Development Model. We wanted to employ this model because of the project's job segregation.

TEXT SUMMARIZER RAD MODEL

As it can be seen here, the development phases on the entirety of UI/UX and logical backend are independent.

So, employing this model was more rational and sensible and the others.
